

ABSTRACT

Methods for formulating material systems of varying chemistry and stoichiometry. The material systems include two or more components and can be analyzed to select the system having the best properties for a particular application. Specific examples of materials systems that can be fabricated and analyzed according to the present invention include layers for membrane electrode assemblies (MEA's) that are useful in the construction of fuel cells and similar devices.